

News highlights

- US equities saw their first positive week since August, even with a weaker end of Friday while European indices registered a third week of gains out of the last four.
- Hopes that US Congress will reach a deal on a relief bill supported equity markets up to the news that President Trump and senior advisors tested positive for Covid-19.
- Eurozone consumer prices fell for a second consecutive month in September, with the year-on-year headline inflation number hitting -0.3%. While some temporary factors were at play (e.g. lower German VAT), the drop of service inflation to just 0.5% demonstrated that the health crisis is having a significant deflationary impact.
- The ECB president Lagarde gave the clearest sign yet that the bank could follow the Fed in changing its inflation target towards a more symmetric approach.
- Although the U.S. economy added 661,000 jobs in September, the latest monthly employment report provided further evidence of a slowdown in the pace of the economic recovery and in the labour participation rate.
- The Tokyo Stock Exchange shut down for the day on Thursday as its operator raced to solve a technical glitch that halted equities trading. The company said it had yet to identify the exact cause of the malfunction but had ruled out a cyberattack. Trading resumed as normal on Friday, although market activity was light due to Golden Week and other holiday closures in several markets across Asia.
- The first of three presidential debates between Trump and Biden turned out to be a chaotic, rowdy event, based on mutual contempt. The status of upcoming Vice-President and Presidential debates remains uncertain.
